

25 YEARS OF ELTED

Richard Smith

English Language Teacher Education and Development (ELTED) Journal has been published now for 25 years and celebrates its Silver Jubilee in 2020. This provides me with an opportunity, in my twentieth year on the Editorial Board and as its Chair since 2009, to thank all those who've supported the journal over the years, as editors, editorial board members, reviewers, administrators, and, of course as contributors and readers! Particular thanks go to Judith Kennedy, who founded and led the journal until her retirement in 2009, and Natalie Sharpling, who has been the Chief Editor over the last decade. Alongside them, many other people have made the journal a success, including but not limited to the original Editorial Board members – Evdokia Karavas-Doukas (until 1998), Corony Edwards, Chris Kennedy and Julia Khan (all until 2004) – and their replacements over time: Ema Ushioda (since 2006), Steve Mann (from 2008), Peter Brown and Annamaria Pinter (since 2009), Dario Banegas (from 2014), and finally Jo Gakonga and Troy McConachy (from 2016). Warwick students Gosia Sky and Erkan Kulekci, and former colleague Tim Kelly, have also rendered service to the journal in the past, not least in its pioneering transition to Open Access online publication from the mid-2000s onwards.

The first volume of ELTED came out in spring 1995 and was edited by Judith Kennedy with Corony Edwards. As can be seen from the Appendix below, which provides an overview of editors and a means of easily browsing contents from all past issues, Judith and Corony were together the journal's prime-movers in its early years, Judith at the Centre for English Language Teacher Education (CELTE), University of Warwick, and Corony at the Centre for English Language Studies (CELS), University of Birmingham. Indeed, until Corony moved on in 2006, the journal was jointly published by CELTE and CELS, with full responsibility for publication being taken on by Warwick from then until the present. From the beginning, the journal was intended not to be UK-centric but international in scope, and in the early years this was often fulfilled by inviting former Birmingham and Warwick students from around the world to write articles based on worthy MA dissertations. Other articles were often commissioned from international experts known to the editors. From volume 10 (2007) onwards, the journal – having gone fully online – could be publicized more widely, for example via the British Council's ELTeCS network, and many more unsolicited contributions began to be received from around the world, necessitating more peer-reviewing. Even with this, however, mentoring potential contributions towards publication has remained a central editorial concern, as has opening up spaces for those who might not otherwise consider writing in an academic journal, for example under 'Action Research' or 'ELTED around the world' or by encouraging reflective reports by teachers and teacher educators.

ELTED continues to welcome contributions which are innovative in form and not necessarily academic in a conventional sense (see our special 20th issue (2016) for examples), so long as their focus is on some aspect of teacher education or teacher training and/or on teachers' professional development (this, of course, is ELTED's remit – and it remains unique as an international peer-reviewed journal specifically devoted to research into ELT teacher education and development, even while welcoming reflective reports).

In a conversation about the journal in ELTED Volume 11 \(2008\) between Judith Kennedy, myself and Ema Ushioda, Judith noted the advantage ELTED has over publisher-owned journals in this area of freedom to innovate, although she also noted the difficulty of maintaining institutional support and academic legitimacy through the changes that have beset UK Higher Education over the years. One such change, since 2008, has been the transformation of CELTE into the Centre for – and now (from 2020) the Department – of Applied Linguistics. While ELT teacher education has at times had to take second place during this period, we have brought it through and it has survived well, indeed been strengthened. Now seems a good time, though, for us to think once more about broadening the ELTED editorial base and rejuvenating, too, to ensure the journal's future.

In the meantime, I invite you to peruse the past articles below and the articles in the present issue, which has been ably edited by Natalie Sharpling, with the assistance of Jason Anderson.
